A Bat-time Story

A chilling story from the collection of Count Blood-curdle: THE GYPSY TIME MACHINE

It was dark and gloomy inside the Baron's townhouse. He sat back in his chair looking at the Venus fly trap plant across the room. Occasionally, he'd throw the plant a black widow spider, just to keep him happy.

But his heart wasn't in the enjoyment of his carnivorous plant. He was expecting a visitor, a gypsy, a man whom he'd heard could work wonders in the ancient art of black magic.

The Baron was living in exile from his own country. He'd taken most of the funds and fled, but now the funds were running low. He had to find new ways to maintain his weird standard of living.

His gloomy townhouse was his pride and joy. He was in the process of redecorating his torture chamber playroom. In it he had all the instruments of terror, including a television set that got all the bad programs.

He was anxious to start his new life in this strange country. But he needed help. He looked at the grotesque grandfather's clock, and smiled at his grandfather who WAS the clock. The face in his tummy said it was noon.

Suddenly, the doorbell rang! He went to answer it, but it was a pointless gesture for the gypsy simply walked through the door like a spirit. "One of the tricks of my trade," he explained.

"I need your help," said the Baron. "I'm out of funds! But more than that I need time!"

The old gypsy sat back in his chair and curled his whiskers with a hot poker from the fireplace. "Time is precious! I can only grant you one hour! How would you like to be ONE HOUR ahead of the human race?"

"What good would that do me?" asked the Baron.

"Think for a moment," said the gypsy. "If you were one hour ahead of the world, you could make a fortune betting on horse races, baseball games and boxing matches! Because you would know who the winner was one hour before anyone else!"

"What is your price?" the Baron asked.

"Ten thousand dollars!" answered the gypsy as he began to make preparations.

Suddenly, the eerie black magic began to work its wonders! The Baron watched in amazement as all the clocks in the house began to spin. Even the grandfather clock was spinning. Grandfather quickly took a dose of sodium bicarbonate to settle his queasy stomach.

Astounded, the Baron raced to the window drapes and drew them back sharply. The clock in the tower across the way said, "ONE O'CLOCK!" while every clock in his house said, "TWO O'CLOCK!"

"How can I believe it's true?" he asked the gypsy.

"Simply turn on the TV set and watch the horse race!" said the gypsy.

They watched the horse race in silence until its conclusion. Then the gypsy said, "Now, go next door and ask your neighbor for the correct time."

With great haste, the Baron ran to the building next door and rang the bell. His neighbor answered and he asked him for the correct time.

"It's one o'clock!" he said, looking at his watch. "Just in time for the races!"

Over the man's shoulder the Baron could see the same horse race that he had viewed earlier, just BEGINNING!

He declined the invitation to stay and watch the race and rushed back to his own townhouse. There, he promptly paid the old gypsy ten thousand dollars and bade him good night. He was an hour ahead. Within a few days, he could make a fortune!

He didn't realize he'd been had until the next morning, when he picked up his newspaper. On the front page there was a small item: Daylight saving time begins today. Turn your clocks one hour AHEAD!
